Looking for work is there a generic for vytorin "What's going on in the U.S. is a concern for the .Why Don't We (Just) Let It Go? "Why Don't We (Just) Let It Go?" is a song by Canadian alternative rock band Barenaked Ladies from the album Turn Down for What. It is the first single released from the album, and was its opening single. The lyrics begin with the narrator declaring that he is the type of person who "would sell his mother for a bottle of beer," but that he does not want to. He then goes on to list more negatives about himself, saying he is a pathological liar and a hypochondriac, and that he has no ambitions. The narrator also claims to be a "cheerful suck-up" and a "six-foot tall social pariah." He then looks forward to the possibility of dying and states that "it's a terrible scene in there," meaning that after dying he would be in hell. He also says that he does not want to die and that he does not want to "keep living." The song was an unexpected hit for the band, reaching number one in the United States and the United Kingdom. Music videos The official music video features the band playing in a small, simple room in the background, and in some shots in front of a black background. The video switches to the band in a colorful room as the video continues. The video has a generally humorous tone, with various references and in-jokes. The video for "Why Don't We (Just) Let It Go" was directed by Bryan Buckley, who had previously done videos for The White Stripes and U2. During the video shoot, it was revealed that the video (and radio version) were a part of a larger concept. The video was supposed to be set in the office of
